5. A masterclass

Give your partner the opportunity to learn from experts like chef Gordon Ramsay or NBA player Steph Curry in these online classes.

CES 2020 Showcase

By DBI Staff Writer

The Consumer Technology Association hosted yet another great convention for technological companies to showcase their latest innovations. This year, many car manufacturers displayed their latest plans for electrification. The next decade is predicted to transform vehicle transportation with autonomy and sustainability in both private and public sectors from electric vehicles to autonomous vehicles. At this year's CES convention, it was a complete shock to everyone that Sony released a fully electric car, the Vision S, that has 33 sensors, advanced cruise control, lane change automation, and self-parking. There was no announcement of the car being manufactured by Sony, so that leaves us to wonder if its technology will be sold to car manufacturers or if a partnership will occur in the near future.

Off the topic of automobiles but arguably one of the best debuts at CES 2020 was BrainCo's (or Brain Robotics) final model of its AI-powered prosthetic hand. Amazingly, it connects to an amputee's muscle signals and brain waves, giving it unlimited gestures and grips. Current prosthetic hands have limited functionality whereas this new prosthetic hand can move individual fingers and give an amputee pianist the ability to play the piano again. Even better, the cost of the prosthetic hand will be between $10,000 and $15,000. That is 80% cheaper than current robotic prosthetic hands. It is currently going through FDA approval to hit the US markets soon.
